

How to Cite a Newsela Article

Citing sources is how good writers give credit to authors whose ideas have influenced their own writing. To cite articles from Newsela, first, decide the appropriate format to use. Then, follow the formatting instructions below so others can find the exact article you read.

Editorial Note

There are two ways to think about citing articles on Newsela. The MAX level is, more or less, the original piece from one of our content partners. This version may be edited slightly, but it is largely the original source. "Edited by Newsela Staff" is the phrasing that we recommend in a works cited. To find the original author's name, view the article at the MAX level and check the byline. (A byline is a line in a newspaper naming the writer of an article. It is located under the title and before the main text of the article.)

For the other levels below MAX, a team of writers re-writes and adapts, by hand, each article for different reading levels. This is done with attention to the original author's voice, background knowledge of the reader, and many other aspects of text complexity. No Newsela text is adapted by computers or via machine text simplification, which is why "Adapted by Newsela Staff" is the phrasing that we recommend in a works cited, along with the original author(s) name.
